Meet the heroes with real steel...

BATTLING Britons sculpted in steel are the newest addition to what is rapidly becoming one of Wales' zaniest attractions.

Sixty works of art adorn the Ffwrwm, the Caerleon arts centre owned by ebullient Dr Russell Rhys.

A self-confessed Arthurian buff, Dr Rhys commissioned South African-born sculptor Helga Prosser to create the work in welded steel. It was officially unveiled by Matthew Pritchard, president of the National Museums and Galleries of Wales.

The sculpture – called The battle of Camlan – shows mortal combat between two Welsh knights. "It is a tribute the the part the Welsh and our hero, King Arthur, have played in European culture," Dr Rhys said.
